

Specificity

Specificity (of an assay or test) is the ability of an experiment or trial to correctly detect only the particular effect being studied – for instance, a difference in symptoms between two groups of participants receiving different medicines in a clinical trial. If a trial is not specific enough, it will give a false positive result (Type I error).